Sequencing

Analyse and justify the sequencing:

- Does new topic knowledge use prior knowledge to inform access to content and concepts covered?
- What is each element doing to make accessible the content in subsequent years/phases?
- Is it logical and coherent with small enough component steps to achieve ambitious end points?
- Where can typical learning gaps be filled in? (What provision has been made for this in how the curriculum is sequenced?)

End Points: Aims and Knowledge in Evidence (per year/per key stage):

Year 7 – Have a chronological knowledge about key events in the medieval period. This is to include the events that led to the Norman invasion of 1066 and how the invading (and conquering) force developed systems of control to exert dominance on the native populace. Children to have knowledge and understanding of the evolution of castle development and the necessity of this change for protection. Children to know and understand the development of heraldry, how to become a knight and the importance of armour, weaponry and tournaments. To understand the motivations behind the crusades and have knowledge of the events concerning the holy land. The children to know about the devastating effects of the Black Death and understand strategies that were used to try to stem the spread of the disease(s). To know about the epidemiology of the disease(s). Pupils can use the skills that they have developed to determine the type of evidence used and use this to determine chronology and avoid anachronisms.

Year 8 – Children to have knowledge about the rise of Lutheranism and the challenge to the Catholic church. Know about the social and economic history of the Tudor period. To know and understand the reasons why Henry VIII began the Church of England, and embarked on the dissolution of the monasteries. To use evidence to argue whether Henry VIII was a good or a poor king. To know about Bloody Mary (I) and about Elizabeth I, her marriage dilemma and the effective use of propaganda. To know why the Spanish attempted to invade with the Armada and to use evidence to determine why it was a failure. To know about the development of the 'spy' masters, some of the crime, punishments and Elizabethan Laws, and the attempts to make a fairer society. To know about Mary Queen of Scots and the Babington Plot. Looking at trade, the wider world and the encounters with the first nations in the Americas. To work independently on the James I and religious division and the gunpowder plot. Know about Charles I and the causes of the civil war. To understand the effectiveness of propaganda and know about some of the key battles. To know about the trial of King Charles I, the rise of Cromwell and the restoration of the monarchy. To use knowledge and understanding to argue the case as to whether Cromwell was a hero or a villain. To understand and have knowledge about how bias and propaganda influences society and its uses through the reformation, renaissance and restoration periods.

Curriculum Intent statement:

The scope of the history curriculum in years 7 and 8 is designed to provide children with a clear knowledge and understanding of events. In year 7 children examine the medieval period, starting with the events around 1066 and ending with the Black Death. In year 8 children work through key events starting with the reformation, working through the renaissance and ending with the restoration. Embedded skills to determine evidence types, sources and chronology, empowers the children to be able to categorise events and determine bias and propaganda, and think for themselves about the chronology of events. They use these skills and the learnt content knowledge to argue a case, such as whether to attack a castle, or if Henry VIII was a good or poor king. The curriculum is sequential and builds on understanding in a logical manner. The coherent and rigorous approach adopted evolves sequentially like a 'story' such as the Norman conquest and the methods they employed to exert control. Or how differences in monarchical and parliamentary philosophies led to inevitable conflict. The knowledge gained is understood because of the context in which sequences of events are seen, and this knowledge is built up over the year. Learning gaps are filled using timelines and the references to the skills throughout the curriculum means that the development of these skills is ongoing and provides accessibility to the other areas of study.
